

Paralympic Oath

The taking of the Paralympic Oath is an important part of the protocol procedures during the Opening Ceremony at the Paralympic Games. After the Paralympic flag has been raised, an athlete from the team of the nation that is organizing the Paralympic Games mounts the official rostrum. He or she holds a corner of the Paralympic flag and raises his/her right hand while reciting the following solemn oath, thereby renewing his/her commitment to a fair competition and the ideals of the Paralympic Movement on behalf of all participants:

In the name of all the competitors I promise that we shall take part in these Paralympic Games, respecting and abiding by the rules which govern them, committing ourselves to a sport without doping and without drugs, in the true spirit of sportsmanship for the glory of sport and the honour of our teams.

The official, also from the host country, does the same, but with a slightly different oath:

In the name of all the judges and officials, I promise that we shall officiate in these Paralympic Games with complete impartiality, respecting and abiding by the rules which govern them, in the true spirit of sportsmanship.

The Paralympic Oath has a long tradition which goes back to the first Paralympic Games in Rome in 1960. The wording is an adapted version of the Olympic Oath, which was originally written by Pierre de Coubertin. De Coubertin had suggested the introduction of an Athlete's Oath of impartiality and fairness as early as 1906. The first Athlete's Oath at an Olympic Games was taken by the Belgian fencer Victor Boin in Antwerp in 1920.¹ It read:

We swear that we will take part in the Olympic Games in a spirit of chivalry, for the honour of our country and for the glory of sport.

Over the years, the original text has been modified several times. The first Official's Oath was taken at the XI Olympic Winter Games in Sapporo in 1972.
